Q: Do I need to use a peer to peer approach to keep computer security? I currently use a windows home server for serving my home network, using a bunch of my computers as clients. I'm fairly good at keeping everyone's windows up to date, so I haven't had any issues with being hacked. I'm considering switching to Ubuntu to be more of a general computer for my home. However, I can't for the life of me figure out if I need to implement a peer to peer method to keep my home network more secure. I'd prefer not to have to buy software, as I'd rather pay for it over time, rather than under three different accounts (one for each computer in the house). I'm currently using BitTorrent as a peer to peer protocol, and it would be ideal for me to continue using it with Ubuntu. My question is, if I buy Ubuntu, is it worth implementing a peer to peer method to keep up with changes to my windows computers, or will Ubuntu just be another piece of software I need to keep up to date as well?

A: I do not have a solution to your specific question, just a view on general peer-to-peer systems and the balance of their benefits and risks. The general view is that the two big benefits of a peer-to-peer networking system are: more choice for where to get the files you want. This is the advantage for when you only have a single computer. If there are other computers on your network, they'll act as 'stalking horses' for the files that are of interest to you. ease of set-up. If you have to rely on FTP or similar methods to access computers on the network, it can be a nuisance to set-up and manage. With P2P, all you need to do is point your web browser to the chosen host. The two big risks are: where you store your data. If it's on a remote site, you can't be sure that they won't go
